

In a team, everyone works together toward a common goal, even if there's disagreement among team members. To illustrate the power of this principle, the Vancouver Canucks produced a video showing how their players pool their strengths together to pull a bus. In case of a disagreement with a team member, don't squash or bully her or him with your own opinion, even if you know you're right. There's always the chance that this person can teach you something you didn't know. So, listen attentively to what he or she has to say and express yourself calmly and respectfully. If the person prefers confrontation or bullying, discussion with her or him will be impossible. Speak instead with a trusted adult.
